Spoken by Jane in Chapter 29, this reflects her internal conflict as Rochester proposes marriage after Bertha’s revelation. While her feelings for him are strong, she recognizes the moral and legal implications of their union. Context: This quote arises as Jane is considering Rochester's proposal. The revelation that he is already married to Bertha Mason creates an insurmountable obstacle. Jane is keenly aware of the ethical implications and the societal scandal that such a marriage would entail. Significance: This quote demonstrates Jane's unwavering moral integrity. She understands that entering into a marriage with a man who is already wed, even under such extenuating circumstances, would be dishonest and morally wrong. This adherence to principle is what drives her to leave Thornfield.

The Power of Narrative: "Reader, I married him."

These concluding words, found in the final chapter, are among the most famous in English literature. They are simple, direct, and imbued with a profound sense of closure and triumph. Context: After all the trials, tribulations, and moral dilemmas, Jane and Rochester are finally able to marry. The Inner Voice: A Cry for Autonomy

One of the most resonant passages comes early in the novel, when Jane declares, "I am no bird; I cannot fly." Far from passive resignation, it is a bold affirmation of agency—a refusal to be confined by societal expectations or personal hardship. This quote encapsulates Jane's journey from vulnerability to strength, underscoring a universal truth: true freedom begins with the courage to assert one's identity.
