The raw bark of the cinnamon tree, a symbol of exoticism and far-off lands, is transformed through human hands into a potent spice, a culinary and aromatic delight. But Ondaatje doesn't stop at the literal. He uses this act as a metaphor for the ways in which we, too, are shaped and reshaped by our experiences, by the people we encounter, and by the desires that stir within us. The poem opens with a vivid sensory experience, immediately drawing the reader into its world. We are presented with the "rough skins of cinnamon," the "sweetness," and the almost tangible presence of the peeler. These images are not merely descriptive; they are laden with symbolic weight, hinting at the delicate balance between beauty and danger, creation and destruction.

The Narrator and the Mystery Woman

The poem’s narrative is built around a central encounter, a clandestine affair between a Dutch paper-maker and a local woman. This unnamed woman, often referred to as the "cinnamon peeler" or simply "she," becomes a figure of immense fascination and power. She is the embodiment of a hidden world, a source of sensual knowledge and a catalyst for the narrator's own awakening. The narrator, a man caught between his Dutch identity and the allure of the island, is drawn to her in a way he cannot fully articulate. His fascination stems not only from her physical beauty but also from her connection to the land, her quiet agency, and the secrets she seems to hold. The act of peeling cinnamon becomes a shared intimacy, a dance of mutual observation and unspoken desire. This relationship, shrouded in secrecy and tinged with the exotic, raises questions about power dynamics, cultural exchange, and the ways in which love can blossom in unexpected circumstances. The Dutch presence on the island, with its colonial undertones, adds another layer of complexity to their entanglement.

The knife, a tool of both utility and potential harm, symbolizes the sharpness of perception, the cutting away of the superfluous, and perhaps even the painful truths that lie beneath the surface. The strips of cinnamon, curled and fragrant, represent the lasting impressions left by experiences and relationships, the enduring essence of things. Ondaatje also explores the symbolism of the body and sensuality. Ondaatje, as a writer, is adept at capturing these fleeting moments and imbuing them with significance. He understands that the most profound truths are often found not in grand pronouncements but in the quiet observations, the subtle shifts in perception, and the sensory details that we might otherwise overlook. The poem can be seen as a meditation on the creative process itself. The narrator, a paper-maker, is involved in the creation of something tangible from raw materials.
